

FedMail[®] Customer Planning for FedACH[®] Contingency Options Guide

Overview

The Federal Reserve Banks advise financial institutions to have contingency plans in place to help minimize the effects of service disruptions to your FedACH business. All financial institutions conducting critical payment transactions should have contingency plans in place and test them regularly to ensure resilience in the event of a service disruption.

About this Guide

This guide provides an overview of some of the situations that might result in a service disruption and contingency options to help minimize the impact of a service disruption on your FedACH business. A service disruption may originate either at the Federal Reserve Banks or your institution. This guide addresses some of the most common contingency scenarios; however, it is not intended to be a complete guide. You should work with your internal technology and risk management teams to develop a detailed contingency plan that best meets your institution's needs.

This guide should be used as a supplement to your institution's business continuity and disaster recovery plans. For more information about how to plan for business continuity review the National Business Continuity Guide found on FRBservices.org at: <http://FRBservices.org/businesscontinuity/index.html>.

This guide will help demonstrate how to:

- Prepare for a service disruption
- Obtain the FedACH activity information you need during a contingency situation

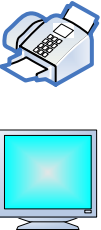

Troubleshooting

This guide was created under the assumption that your organization has finished troubleshooting and has identified the cause of the service disruption.

In case of a service disruption, please continue to report any problems to the designated Customer Contact Center (CCC). Although the CCC is equipped to support institutions in case of a contingency situation, the extent to which support can be provided depends highly on the institution's level of preparation for such events. The CCC is committed to providing the utmost level of service during contingency situations and will take all reasonable measures to help customers regain control of their operations; however, immediate resolution may not be possible. Customers of the Atlanta, Boston, Chicago, Kansas City, New York and Philadelphia districts should contact 800-333-2690, option 1. Customers of the Cleveland, Dallas, Minneapolis, Richmond, San Francisco and St. Louis districts should contact 888-333-7010, option 1.
